KAMPALA, Uganda (AP) - Health authorities in Uganda say the supply of blood has declined sharply since the onset of the coronavirus pandemic as fewer people donate and schools remain closed. The consequences are sometimes deadly. Students, especially those in high school, are the largest group of blood donors in the East African country, but schools have been closed since March amid efforts to curb the spread of the virus. This means that the government agency tasked with collecting blood is failing to meet its targets. Dr. Emmanuel Batiibwe, the director of a hospital that cares for many of the capital's poorest residents, Kampala, cited multiple deaths there in recent months related to blood shortages. One victim was a woman with pregnancy complications. Children under 5 and patients living in the operating room are also among those who often need a blood transfusion, he said. In July, Batiibwe's China-Uganda Friendship Hospital received only 18 of an advanced 218 units of blood. The next month 68 of the 217 units came in, he said. There is a problem somewhere, he said, calling the deficit a disaster. The head of Uganda's Blood Transfusion Services, Dr. Dorothy Byabazaire, told lawmakers earlier this year that her agency collected 56,850 units of a targeted 75,000 between April and July. Facilities across the country submit blood orders to the agency, and there is a distribution mechanism between facilities in case of emergency. But borrowing blood can be time consuming, Batiibwe said. The Ugandan Red Cross, which helps authorities mobilize blood donors, said it has not been easy to recruit donors during the pandemic. The country has confirmed more than 8,600 coronavirus cases, including 79 deaths. People don't feed well anymore. People are stressed, said spokeswoman Irene Nakasiita, adding that willing, potential donors are rejected because their blood levels are too low. Similar challenges were repeated by Ariho Franco, a donor recruiter for a blood bank operated by Kampala's private Mengo Hospital, who said that while are closed they are aimed at public places. They have set up tents in locations such as the public square in the centre of Kampala. Donors receive soda and cookies. The blood shortage is a serious problem because the few people out there that we are able to donate due to various reasons, Franco said. He said blood collection teams face challenges in finding donors among communities reeling from the economic impact of the pandemic. Some people say they're not sure where their next meal will come from, he said. At the end of the day, some people can only survive by the grace of God because the small blood that will have been collected will only be reserved for serious emergencies, he said. Elsewhere, including in parts of Europe, blood shortages have been reported. Local media in Romania have cited fears of COVID-19 infections among the reasons for a decline in the number of blood donors. The cities of Iasi and Cluj face a dire situation as some cancer patients who need frequent transfusions and people who have had urgent surgery to bring their own donors to survive. ___ Vadim Ghirda in Bucharest, Romania, contributed.
